SEATTLE (AP) Northwest's third major less than a week brought in rains and high winds along the coast, while warming trends threatened to wash away in water and mud.

On the southern Oregon coast, gusts of up to 100 mph blew down several beach towns, toppling power poles and knocking out power to some homes.

Farther north, on the Washington coast, gusts of 60 mph were reported at the Everett-Pullman Airport, while waves were seen at Cannon Beach in southwest Washington.

The National Weather Service posted flood warnings in several areas in the state, where heavy weather was expected to bring snow above 5,000 feet in the southern Cascade Mountains.

Coastal flooding was reported in Aberdeen, 80 miles south of Seattle, when morning tides met the overflow of swollen rivers headed for the Pacific Ocean, authorities said.

"The city of Aberdeen is holding the water back, and the river is overflowing," said Mike Spokesman for the Grays Harbor Sheriff's office. "It's a mess. There's nowhere to go."

Around midnight, thousands of people gathered outside the Space Needle in Seattle for the annual New Year's Eve celebration.

Eleven people in the crowd were injured.
